Determination of nitrate and nitrite in fermented food by flow injection analysis with a chemiluminescence reaction. Nitrite is present in fermented foods in an amount that can be toxic to some individuals with a cardiovascular condition. Currently, nitrite is determined by the standard colorimetric method. A new flow injection method is proposed, which includes the determination of nitrite by flow injection analysis with chemiluminescence detection, based on the reaction of nitrite with ozone. Detection of the by-product nitric oxide (NO) produced during the reaction is based on chemiluminescence detection. Analytes are injected in a stream containing ozone and a chemiluminescence reagent. NO reacts with ozone to produce NO₂, and this in turn reacts with the chemiluminescence reagent to produce chemiluminescence. Spectrofluorometric method for the determination of nitrite has been applied for comparison with the flow injection method. A calibration curve was found to be linear within the range from 1.4 to 24 µg of nitrite mL⁻¹. The proposed flow injection method was applied to the determination of nitrate and nitrite in wine
